About Roosevelt University's Program:

Students who major in English will undertake a course of study designed to develop knowledge in literary trends, themes and genres, as well as skills in critical interpretation, research, writing and speaking. In advanced courses, students will investigate the structure, style, intellectual content, historical significance and cultural context of the literature produced in Great Britain and the United States, as well as Anglophone literature from around the world. This extensive textual study will foster appreciation of diverse cultural values and of the means by which culture is transmitted through language.

Roosevelt's bachelor's in English offers faculty advising each semester to students in the major, minor and creative writing concentration. Our program offers the low student/faculty ratio of a teaching-focused institution, with faculty that have impressive research agendas and credentials, including many publications, awards and honors at
